

English for Academic Purposes

A course focusing on the grammar, lexis, style and skills of English language in an academic context. The course covers all the main areas of language use, including academic writing, listening to lectures, participating in seminars, making presentations and advanced reading techniques.

English for Specific Academic Purposes

Some aspects of Academic English, such as how to structure an academic paper, are universal. But the needs of specific disciplines can be very specialised.

We recognise this at Tertiary Training Services and have developed a range of modular programmes in English for Specific Academic Purposes that can meet the need for targeted training.

We can develop specialist modules for any discipline, such as the sciences, engineering, law and medicine. These cover not only the distinctive vocabulary used in each field, but the genre differences of each.

International communication

Internationalisation strategies for universities have two aspects: internal and external

Excellent English-medium courses are a pre-requisite for a successful internationalisation strategy, but building good relationships with external partners in foreign countries is equally important in maintaining and growing incoming student numbers.

Tertiary Training Services has developed two specialist courses to support both academic and administrative staff in their dealings with foreign partners.

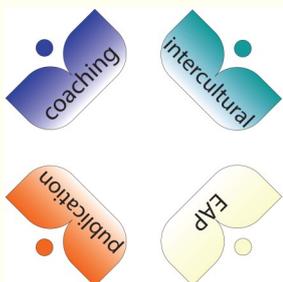

The products described on this page are modular and can be taken individually or as part of a complete programme. They are available as completely face-to-face, in a blended format, or completely distance, and they can be tailored so that they meet professional development requirements in individual countries and regions.
